Essay:

There were times when a human was just another animal. Then, the situation changed: population grew, countries were created, knowledge expanded. Now the nature no longer prevails in controlling this situation, it can't restore a natural balance or grow more fruits than a tree can hold. To satisfy its existence, be healthy and prosper, society must act carefully, but don't hold back on issues that require immediate response. By caring for more than their eyes can see, people can be happy.

From ancient times it is thought that people are better off when they know as little as possible about occurring disasters. Those times were hard - one generation suffered war, next one brought up new soldiers. One was struck by a plague, other healed it's wounds. Today, young children are asked to eat the whole plate because there are people who don't get to eat at all. I heard this phrase personally over and over, and I feel that it is very misleading, does not define why I should eat and dishonours those who don't have what to eat. It is wrong to give poor people as an example of what should not be done. From childhood it could be better taught how people survive under crisis, that means learning about most aspects of their lives - how do they react, what's bothering them, do they feel happy, what are their ideas. Nazis, communists tried to prevent the truth from coming out by adding censure, but the cat left the hat - we have freedom of speech and most of the secrets are revealed. Society can't hide it's misfortunes. Sharing good and bad experiences, thinking whether you are making sense while talking, being open-minded and just is what every person in a society can do.

The thickness of a wall will not mean anything if it's made from the wrong substance. I would advise a society to re-think the need of everything that they did not make on their own. Nicolaus Copernicus questioned whether the Sun is really flying around the Earth and later he proved this theory to be wrong. What if someone sat down and thought about the need of energy really seriously, and came up with an alternative solution? What if astronomers found a habitable planet nearby, but we no longer had materials to build a rocket and fly to it? I think we need to invest man power, money power and mass-media power into science. Instead of bail-outing car companies that actually waste energy and damage our planet, society can invest in space exploration, batteries-based vehicles and give food if someone or some other society needs it. There could be a better way out, nevertheless when I observe today's food and energy crisis, I notice the difficulty of the system and all those poor people that can't be left to stay as they are. A good example, recycling already changes waste burning, so it is in society's hands to go over old ideas and change them into new ones.

When trying to get better it is very difficult not to move into a wrong path, take a wrong turn. Nuclear bombs in Japan during World War 2 killed thousands whereas nuclear power plants provide one of the cleanest energy sources accessible. On the other hand, putting an idea into a wider consideration postpones the delivery. Ireland people did not accept European Treaty because it did not suit them. We can survive without this document for a while, but we would starve to death without food in less than one month. Therefore society has to be united, but it can't ignore argumentative critique. Moreover, If we are suffering such thing as a crisis, those critics better provide some alternative, because i don't see why a starving child or a freezing old lady should not be helped. There's a British film "Hunger". It depicts a person protesting against thoughtless arrest. Why not help? "Help another, help each other" should be a slogan for a prospering society.

At last, people have resources to fix problems with. It is possible to prevent a crisis by speaking and thinking about one in time. Society can change the roots if it tries seriously. An attempt to help prevails against forgetting the problem. It is not really necessary to look back at nature and hope it will give an answer. Bridges were built by human hand's power, happiness can be created too.
